1. Introduction

In ancient time, the visually handicapped children were treated with hostility and were neglected. They were considered as 'Curse of God'. They were viewed as the victims of punishment by supernatural power. They were considered useless, incapable of doing anything. It was regarded as a punishment for his past sins. Negative attitudes towards blindness were widely prevalent. Thus, no attempt was made for their education, training, habilitation and rehabilitation. They were at a distance (aloof) from the physical and social world due to lack of sight. This sensory deprivation creates adjustment problems and other personality problems among visually handicapped children. After the world war II, special education made a comeback with wealthy and powerful people like US president Kennedy and president Johnson taking interest in the education of all handicapped.

The eye is very important sensory organ which accounts for a very large fraction of total information available to a person through his senses. It has been estimated that more than three-fourth of all learning comes through the use of the eyes. The visually handicapped children have to do all their learning using their other senses which are not impaired i.e. hearing, taste, and smell, sensation or touch. Research Studies show that about one child in every five has a correctible vision defect and vision defects left undetected or uncorrected for too long may bring about failure, retardation, or other maladjustments.

With the development of democracy and socialism in different countries of the world, education was started considered to be basic right of the child. This realization paved the way for mainstreaming disabled children. However, a discernible change has taken place for attitude of visually handicapped children after the International Year of Disabled Persons (IYDP, 1981). Visually handicapped is considered as a low prevalence handicapping condition existing in approximately one in every 1000 school children population. But as per the National Sample Survey Organization (NS-50, 1991), the visually handicapped in India are nearly 4,00.5 million in chronological age of 0-14 which constitutes 0.3 percent of school children.

In India, not more than 5 percent visually handicapped children receive education. A much smaller fraction of our blind adults achieve economic independence. Most of the institutions for visually handicapped are largely urban based. It is found that more than 80 percent of our blind people live in rural areas, where practically no rural services exist for them. There is urgent need to devote large resources for the development of services to the blinds in the rural areas (Encyclopedia of social-world in India, volume I).

A Visually handicapped child is defined in terms of visual acuity, field of vision, and visual efficiency. 'Visual ability' of the eye to see distant objects clearly is assessed using the Snellen's chart, developed by Herbert Snellen, a Dutch doctor. The chart starts with a big 'E' which a normal eye can see at a distance of 200 ft. When vision of a person is so handicapped or impaired that to see the 'E' clearly he has to come within 20ft. of it or nearer, he is then considered legally blind. His vision is assessed as 20/200 in the better eye. It simply means a legally blind person sees something at 20 ft. distance which can be seen by a normal at 200 ft. easily. The children are partially sighted whose visual acuity does not exceed 20/70. Visual impairment is a condition in which a student's vision is deficient to such a degree that it significantly affects his school functioning. Another description may also be used to classify an individual as blind. If the visual field is severely limited, that person may be considered blind even if visual acuity is better than 20/200. This visual field limitation is often called tunnel vision. If the visual field is no greater than 20 degrees in width, the individual can still be classified as being blind even though visual acuity is not within typical range of blindness.
