GENERAL INTRODUCTION

Anthropology has long had a love-hate relationship with the study of human sexuality. Although the origins of anthropology were marked by concerns and debates over the topic (275, 356), contemporary anthropologists have generally moved away from consideration of the "erotic and exotic" into more respectable and less controversial kinds of topics. Meanwhile sexuality remains an intrinsic, if rarely studied, aspect of human experience (124).

This essay is a brief review of cross-cultural human sexuality and the typical concerns anthropologists have brought to the study of sexual practices. In order to present the range of areas that anthropologists have investigated, detail has been sacrificed for comprehensive coverage. Following discussions of history, methods, and ethics, the review is divided into a discussion of two major topics: heterosexual behavior and homosexual behavior. Although we have attempted to include examples of the wide-ranging concerns and interests of anthropologists, it has been necessary to neglect equally important approaches. Excluded are discussions of human biology and evolution, reproductive health and hygiene, gender role and status (297), the psychodynamic approach to understanding human sexual behavior, and historical surveys of Western sexual practice (65, 130). Instead we focus on cross-cultural studies of sexual practice that attempt to deal with human sexual arousal, attraction, and customary means of dealing with sexuality in non-Western cultures.
