

the nuclear weapon can never be justified on the basis of military necessity (p. 623), a view that is reiterated in Singh/McWhinney when arguing that the "fundamental requirement of military success, however paramount, would not by itself justify resort to illegal weapons of war" (p. 64).

These two works, regardless of the ideological approaches of their authors, emphasize that it is far from certain that the nuclear weapon or its use is, as the law stands at present, illegal either in the light of conventional or of customary law. It is not enough to point out that the weapon has effects that would appear to bring it within the ban on unnecessary suffering or of poison, for what is important is the view and practice of states — particularly those most affected — and they are far from accepting such a contention (see, e.g., the reviewer's Myres S. McDougal Distinguished Lecture "Nuclear Weapons and the Law of Armed Conflict," 17 Denver Journal of International Law and Policy 1-27 (Fall 1988)).

Today, partly because of the impact of the Tokyo, Hague, and Montreal conventions, and partly as a result of successful activities by ground forces against hijacked aircraft, there has been a change in the nature of acts directed against aerial traffic. Such incidents as the destruction of the Air India flight from Canada and the Lockerbie disaster, as well as the discovery of explosives in the personal luggage of air travellers, suggest that the destruction of aircraft in flight is likely to be much more significant as an international crime than the original type of hijacking. Nevertheless, the problems relating to the control of aerial piracy remain as important for the international community as they ever were.
