

Body Composition Assessment in Nutrition and Clinical Practice

The assessment of nutritional status and body composition has major relevance to determine the presence of increased risk for nutrition-related conditions.

An increased body mass index is positively associated with various cardiovascular and metabolic diseases.

Osteoporosis can occur from inadequate calcium and vitamin D intake and are associated with aging.

Dietitians are tasked with identifying and treating various nutrition-related diseases through dietary intervention.

However, many different methods of body composition assessment exist today making it difficult to determine which is most appropriate for a given situation.
