

Introduction

The testicles are the organs responsible for producing testosterone (the main hormone that creates stallion-like physical features and behavior). Removal of both testicles usually rids the horse of unwanted stallion-like behavior, including screaming at and fighting with other horses, attempting to mount other horses, erection, masturbation, and potentially aggressive behavior toward humans. However, when castration is performed at a late age and/or after the horse has been used to breed mares, is not always successful in abolishing learned stallion-like behavior. Even though the horse will not be able to reproduce, the behavior of mounting mares in the pasture in an attempt to breed and aggressive behavior with other horses might not cease.

- Reduces unwanted behaviour

By castrating a stallion, the veterinarian is removing the testicles which produce the hormone testosterone. It is this hormone which is responsible for stallion-like behaviour including fighting and mounting. It also reduces the risk of the horse harming itself and others as a result of hormone induced aggressive behaviour. Neutering thus allows the horses to be kept together and not isolated from the rest of the herd. This is especially important since horses need company of its own species in order to experience happy lives. The castration will also usually make the male horse more easily handled by the owner and less distracted by other horses when working. The sooner the castration is performed the more likely the stallion-like behaviour will be reduced.

- Gelded horses grow taller than stallions

It was commonly thought that the stallion is larger than the gelding and so this is why some people may delay the time when they have their stallion castrated. However, without testosterone the growth plates of the bone do not close and this leads to the gelding growing usually around half an inch taller than if it had been left entire.

- It can prevent or cure certain diseases

Hereditary diseases can be prevented from continuing down further generations if they are quickly prevented to breed. In addition, humans prefer to selectively breed their horses to produce desirable, and reduce unfavourable, characteristics for racing or shows. This may also be done to deal with the behavioural aspects of some horses. Often, the preferred method for this is to breed a very docile horse with a high intensity horse in the hope of producing alert, sweet natured and attentive offspring.
