George Z. F. Bereday and Shigeo Masui

INTERVIEWER: How many hours per week are devoted to foreign language teaching in Japan?

TEACHER: At the senior high level, more than five hours per week.

INTERVIEWER: Do you think five hours a week of foreign language teaching is enough, I think so.

INTERVIEWER: Would you advocate two months of only foreign language all day? You do not believe in total immersion?

TEACHER: That sort of method can be used on immigrants to give them a certain kind of language training, but in school it would not be good.

INTERVIEWER: What displeased you most about language instruction in America?

TEACHER: There seemed to be no effective stimuli to encourage learning.

INTERVIEWER: What sort of stimuli would you advise us to adopt?

TEACHER: Knowledge of a foreign language should be required before a student can enter the university. Foreign-language study does not seem to be popular among high school students.

INTERVIEWER: Would you recommend foreign travel for students or meeting foreign visitors in their schools as a means of increasing student interest in foreign languages?

TEACHER: I think that the objective of foreign-language teaching is not just to get students to speak the language they are learning there should be something more. Foreign-language teaching is given in this country to acquaint students with a foreign country before
