- Recording UX research interviews can help with contextualizing and capturing the research process (includes documenting research goals and needs, identifying familiarity with the platform or concept being designed).
- A research survey is an essential tool to assess potential clients before moving forward into the research process.
- A good research survey should aim to gauge potential clients' level of interest and experience on certain topics, should include a mix of open and closed-ended questions, and should be clear, concise, and easy to understand.

Each insight includes a Quote button and a Highlight button. A quote from the video reads: "I found that my UX research interviews and I often learn so that in some it's like a better time to still thinking memory or that to come or with new ways to think of things across the way, if I can capture what the person has said?"
