

Chemical Process Hazard Analysis High Hazard Review Checklist

(See attached instructions)

Introduction

Every laboratory performing chemical processes should have a current hazard analysis. The Process Hazard Analysis (PHA) is mandatory for chemical processing laboratories that fall under 29 CFR 1910.1450 to assess the hazards associated with new or modified chemical processes or operations. The High Hazard Review Checklist is used in evaluating the safety of new, modified, or relocated experiments or tests, which present a high potential hazard to employees, equipment and facilities, or the environment. Supervisor's Designees or employees performing the operation are responsible for completing the analysis. Participation by a representative of the Occupational Safety and Health Division (Code 350) is required.

Instructions at the end of this template provide information on the hazard review process, and aid in determining which level of Process Hazard Review is appropriate: Low, Moderate, or High. A High Hazard Review (HHR) is conducted for "high hazard" equipment, experiments, and processes, which, in the event of a failure, present a significant potential for injury, equipment damage, or environmental impact. An HHR requires a special review team to thoroughly analyze the potential hazards in the specific planned laboratory environment to identify process changes and hazard mitigation measures.

The responsible organization shall establish a HHR Committee consisting of the Supervisor's Designee (who will chair the committee), a representative of the Occupational Safety and Health Division (OSH), Medical and Environmental Division (Code 250), researcher, technician, Chemical Safety Committee (CSC) representative, and any other resources deemed necessary. The HHR Committee performs a comprehensive analysis of all potential hazards involved in the laboratory processes and equipment. A member of the CSC or an OSH representative can help determine how best to accomplish the review, based on the nature of the hazard(s) presented. OSH shall be the final approval authority of the process.

This type of review requires a number of documents to be assembled for or made available to the review committee. Piping and instrument diagrams, as applicable; chemical reaction characteristics; safeguards and personal protective equipment; relevant incident reports, as applicable; and operating and emergency procedures are all examples of what should be provided. Other types of documents may be identified by the review committee.

The review shall be documented thoroughly. The completed review package, in combination with other required laboratory operating procedures, constitutes the laboratory safety documentation package. This package shall be available in a prominent location in the laboratory or the electronic location posted while the work is in progress.
