

Deterrence: The Legal Threat in Crime Control by Franklin Zimring and Gordon Hawkins.

University of Chicago Press (5801 Ellis Avenue, Chicago, Illinois 60637), 1973, 376 pp., hardcover - $13.50.

The appearance of this book is an important event. It represents an attempt to raise the status of the deterrence concept from one of a minor belief to that of a major topic. The concept has lurked in the shadows of the theory and practice of criminal justice for decades and it is high time that it was brought out and thoroughly examined. Unfortunately, Zimring and Hawkins only do half the job: they analyze past, present and future research with great skill; but their theoretical discussion, especially their refusal to discuss the assumptions underlying deterrence, results in a book which becomes an exercise in the legitimization (in the pejorative sense) of a belief. Their refusal to discuss the assumptions may be interpreted as an ideological bias which is not necessarily specific to the authors, but rather is intrinsic to the deterrence concept: that is, that the "Tiger" (to which they refer in one of their several jokes) in us all must be deterred.

They try to hide the Tiger by classifying it, and by doing so, make some interesting distinctions: (1) absolute deterrence — the effects on rates of behavior when a threat is completely removed, (2) marginal deterrence — effectiveness of one type of threat compared to a different kind of threat, and (3) partial deterrence — where a threat reduces a particular type of behavior only in part — e.g., reducing 'speeding' from 90 to 70 m.p.h. Unfortunately these distinctions only serve to obfuscate the theoretical tension which underlies the concept of deterrence. They quietly review some of the harshest critics of "simple deterrence" ("... the theory... that threats can reduce crime by causing a change of heart, induced by the unpleasantness of the specific consequences threatened" p. 75). It is based on a false psychology, they report, yet find they must conclude that "others [Andreasen and Norval Morris] while discarding the model, have recognized the plausibility of the notion" (p. 76).
