Expanding Frontiers of Biomedical Research: The Contributions of Basic Scientific Research

Alex Boye[1] and Richard KD Ephraim[1]

[1] Department of of Medical Laboratory Science, School of Allied Health Sciences, College of Health and Allied Sciences, University of Cape Coast, Cape Coast, Ghana

Introduction

As always, the scientific cause aims at improving human life at all levels through the use of time-tested scientific knowledge and practices. At the root of this lies scientific enquiry which fuels translational research efforts. Generation of scientific knowledge and its dissemination is critical to the scientific cause. In the light of this the Integrated Health Research Journal (IHRJ) was established to serve as the official research conduit of the College of Health and Allied Sciences (CoHAS), University of Cape Coast. Thus, the IHRJ provides a platform for researchers and scientists in the medical and biomedical fields to advance dissemination of quality research outcomes capable of stimulating translational research and generation of health policies to improve human health and wellbeing. In the first call for articles, a total of twenty-one submissions were received out of which seven were accepted for publication after rigorous editorial and review processes.

The focus of all the accepted articles were within that of the IHRJ. For instance, one of the articles highlighted the relationship between indiscriminate use of tetracaine hydrochloride ophthalmic solutions and development of multi-drug antibiotic resistance (Kyei, Boadi-Kusi, Effram-Menyah, Dua, 2023). Telehealth has emerged as one of the approaches to overcome barriers to healthcare coverage. Interestingly, one study assessed barriers to telehealth during the Covid-19 pandemic in rural North America and observed that few studies investigated barriers to telehealth in rural communities and those studies overly focused on short term health outcomes instead of long term health outcomes. Exposure to xenobiotics through matrices such as food, water, air and the soil put humans at high risk for certain diseases. Vowotor and colleagues determined hazard quotient of micronutrients in breastmilk and observed that manganese, sodium, magnesium, calcium, and copper were in levels above the upper limit of the WHO recommended dietary allowance possibly exposing breast feeding infants to risk of metal/metalloid-related toxicity (Vowotor, Sackey, Amuah, Huxortey, Aboh, and Druye, 2023).

Another study (Boachie, Piiga, Dadzie, Essuman, and Boye, 2023) reported transfusion-related adverse reactions from a district hospital in Kumasi detailing the incidence and the factors that contribute to transfusion-related adverse reactions. Non-communicable diseases such as chronic kidney disease (CKD) has been on the increase and it was refreshing to note from a study (Ewua-Gyan, Abdul-Wahab, Donkor, Awuku, Okyere, Botchway et al, 2023) which assessed predictability and accuracy of kidney failure risk equation. Finally, a study detailed the pattern of patient referrals in Northern Ghana.

Summarily, the first issue of IHRJ captured important topics in the core areas of medical and biomedical research and it is hoped that researchers will double their basic research efforts to inform translational research, policy and practice.
