

Implicit theories of health predict compliance in chronically-ill children

Claudia Mueller Stanford University, United States of America; Carol Dweck; Robert Wright

Children's beliefs have been shown to influence their behaviours in a variety of settings. Dweck and associates have demonstrated that when people believe a particular trait is fixed ('entity theory') rather than subject to improvement ('incremental theory'), they respond negatively to situations in which that trait is challenged. We have shown that healthy adolescents have theories about wellness that predict their responses to illness in peers. In this study, we examine how the health beliefs of chronically-ill adolescents predict their adherence behaviors and their coping with disease. 116 adolescents with Type 1 diabetes were given a questionnaire designed to define their theories of health (Health Belief Scale). They were then asked about their attitudes toward illness as well as about their medical compliance. Clear differences were noted in adherence behaviours: entity theorists were significantly less likely to comply with medical regimens than incremental theorists. Health theories were also able to predict medical outcomes. We have been able to demonstrate that children's notions of health predict their attitudes and behaviours during periods of health and of illness. We believe these findings to have major relevance for the management of chronic disease in adolescents. Future investigations will target feedback messages that might improve coping with disease.
