

Complex Demonstratives: A Quantificational Account by Jeffrey C. King. Cambridge, MA: MIT Press 2001. Pp. 207. H/b £ 30.50, P/b £ 12.50.

Complex demonstratives, that is, noun phrases of the form 'that F', have received particular attention in recent times largely because it has been thought that they pose problems for the traditional account of direct reference, inaugurated by David Kaplan ('Demonstratives', manuscript, 1977; published in J. Almog, J. Perry and H. Wettstein (eds), Themes from Kaplan, Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1989). According to this account, a demonstrative expression is viewed as a singular term contributing the object (the content) into what is said, that is, into the proposition expressed. Kaplan suggests that the linguistic meaning (the character) of a demonstrative ('this', 'that', 'she', etc.), unlike the character of a pure indexical ('I', 'now', 'today', ...), together with context (agent, time, place and possible world), is not enough to select a referent. Recently, Kaplan argued that what is relevant in fixing the reference of a demonstrative is the directing intention; the demonstration is a manifestation of this intention ('Afterthoughts', op. cit., pp. 565–614). Within this framework, complex demonstratives fall under the category of demonstratives and are taken to be singular terms. The descriptive material accompanying the demonstrative is viewed along the lines of the demonstration and/or directing intention. As such, it assists in selecting the referent, the propositional constituent. Let us call this the referentialist position.

In a well-argued and well-written book, King puts forward a strong case for thinking that complex demonstratives are not singular terms. They do not contribute a referent into what is said. Instead, they must be treated as quantified expressions such as 'all F', 'few F', 'the F', 'many F', ... The demonstrative component of a complex demonstrative is considered to be a determiner (such as 'all', 'some', 'the', 'most', ...) of a quantified noun phrase. Call this position the quantificational view. King's discussion of this phenomenon is the most exhaustive so far. King carries the reader straight to the core of each problem and offers a substantial amount of data in favour of his position, yet the book remains extremely concise.

The book is not merely of great interest to those working on understanding complex demonstratives. At the end of the book, King urges that simple demonstratives should be treated along with complex demonstratives and not as devices of direct reference. That would leave only pure indexicals and proper names in play as susceptible to the referentialist picture. In what follows, I shall concentrate on the following three arguments in King's work that appear to present the greatest challenge to the referentialist position. It should be mentioned, though, that King proposes a variety of other arguments in Reference and Representation in Thought and Language María Ponte, Kepa Korta, 2017 This volume offers novel views on the precise relation between reference to an object by means of a linguistic expression and our mental representation of that object long a source of debate in the philosophy of language linguistics and cognitive science Chapters in this volume deal with our devices for singular reference and singular representation with most focusing on linguistic expressions that are used to refer to particular objects persons or places These expressions include proper names such as Mary and John indexicals such as I and tomorrow demonstrative pronouns such as this and that and some definite and indefinite descriptions such as The Queen of England or a medical doctor Other chapters examine the ways we represent objects in thought particularly the first person perspective and the self and one explores a notion common to reference and representation salience The volume includes the latest views on these complex topics from some of the most prominent authors in the field and will be of interest to anyone working on issues of reference and representation in thought and language

Language in Context Jason Stanley, 2007 Natural languages all contain constructions the interpretation of which depends upon the situation in which they are used In Language and Context Jason Stanley presents a series of essays which develop a theory of how the situation in which we speak interacts with the words we use to help produce what we say The reason we can so smoothly operate with sentences that can be used to express very different items of information Stanley argues is that there are linguistically mandated constraints on the effects of the situation on what we say These linguistically mandated constraints are most evident in the cases of sentences containing explicit pronouns such as She is a mathematician where interpretation of the information expressed is guided by the use of the pronoun she But even when such explicit pronouns are lacking our sentences provide similar cues to allow our interlocutors to determine the information expressed We are in the main confident that our interlocutors will smoothly grasp what we say because the grammar and meaning of our sentences encodes these constraints In defending this theory Stanley pays close attention to specific cases of context sensitive constructions such as quantified noun phrases comparative adjectives and conditionals Philosophers and cognitive scientist have appealed to the dependence of what is intuitively said by a sentence on the situation in which it is uttered to argue against the possibility of a systematic theory of meaning for natural language The theory developed in this book is a vigorous defense of the possibility of a systematic theory of meaning for natural language against these influential tendencies
