

BLACKS RUN: RETURNING TO LIFE

Stream and river health can be measured by the presence or absence of various organisms, which indicate specific habitat conditions such as the amount of oxygen, the amount of sediment, and streamflow, and by the presence of certain species. Stream health is also measured by the presence of stream structures that are tolerant of pollution, such as many types of fish, turtles, and plants. Vegetated and forested banks benefit the habitat by providing shade, debris for shelter, and food. Leaves and vegetation, as well as insects, that fall into the stream make up the primary food source of many aquatic organisms. As water quality improves these organisms flourish, which together indicate the entire ecosystem. The presence of a variety of aquatic animals is clearly a sign of a healthy ecosystem.
