

Concorde less attractive and the options held by the major airlines had been allowed to lapse. Until recently options on three aircraft were held by Iran Air, but these were cancelled following a change in government in that country. The upheaval in Iran also caused another increase in fuel prices and British Caledonian dropped its plans to operate one of the unsold aircraft on its South American routes.

At present Concorde operates between London, New York, Washington and Bahrain with British Airways, and between Paris, New York, Washington and Rio with Air France. In addition, interline agreements between the two airlines and Braniff International allow the latter's crews to operate the aircraft between Washington and Dallas/Fort Worth. A similar agreement between British Airways and Singapore International Airlines allows SIA crews to operate the aircraft between Bahrain and Singapore.

In mid-1972 the British and French governments began winding up their financial involvement in the project and announced that no further development of supersonic transport aircraft would be supported. At the time of the announcement a total of 16 production aircraft had been built. Of these, five are in service with British Airways, four with Air France and five remain unsold. Unless the Chinese carrier CAAC exercises its options on three aircraft it is possible that at least some of the unsold aircraft will be transferred to the present carriers at a later date; two prototype and two pre-production aircraft are preserved in British and French museums.

Concorde has been continuously attacked by environmental groups. These organizations are still greatly concerned about the high-flying Concorde's effect on the ozone layer in the atmosphere, even though the SST was cleared by tests conducted during the US Climatic Impact Assessment programme in 1973. The aircraft has also attracted more deserved criticism for its shattering noise levels, the nuisance being worst in the region of the international airports from which it operates. Unquestionably a technological tour de force, Concorde has proved to be a commercial and environmental failure.
