FINGER PRINTS LESSON 11

LETTERED LOOP SUBCLASSIFICATION

You learned in the last lesson that there are 1024 different primary classifications. This means that the full sets of ten prints of every man, woman, and child on earth will fall into one of these 1024 primary groups. As you know from your studies of primary groups, the three basic types of finger prints—*the waves, the three basic types of finger prints—*the waves, the three basic types of finger prints—do not appear with equal frequency. For that reason, primary classifications do not appear with equal regularity, either.

Just as plain loop patterns appear much more frequently than do whorls or arches, so will certain primary classifications be more numerous. The primary classification of $\frac{1}{4}$ is the most frequent of all. On the average, it appears in about 25% of all finger print sets. Other common primaries are those having denominators of 2, 3, 9, 17, 19, 28 and 32.

You can see from this explanation, if an identification bureau has 100,000 sets of prints on file, approximately 25,000 of them will have primary classifications of $\frac{1}{4}$. To facilitate searching and filing, it is necessary to have some means of breaking up or subdividing these large accumulations of finger print cards in the congested primary sections of a finger print file. This is accomplished through the use of subclassifications.

There are two types of subclassifications, loop-subclassification and whorl subclassification. And, as you will see from the following table, there are two kinds of loop subclassifications, lettered and unlettered.
