

What Is a Black Hole?

National Aeronautics and Space Administration

A black hole is an area of such immense gravity that nothing, not even light, can escape from it.

The area around a singularity where nothing—including light—is able to escape is called an event horizon. That's probably what you are thinking of when you think of a black hole.

Event Horizon

What would happen if you took a spaceship into a black hole's event horizon? The end closer to the black hole would experience its much more gravity than the other end. But it would stretch out like a piece of spaghetti. That's the scientific term for "spaghettification."

The exact point is called a singularity.

The material all ends after the explosion falls into an infinitely small point.

All of that collapsing matter creates a magnificent explosion.

Some of the star's matter is ejected as well as it is trapped from the center to create a shell and a nebula.

Black holes can form at the end of some stars' lives.

Black holes can form in many ways and have a range of masses. Stellar black holes have the mass of a few times that of our sun. Supermassive black holes, as the other kind, have the mass of 1,000,000 suns. All trapped within a tiny singularity.
