

GRILLED CACTUS PADDLES

Cactus paddles have always been considered a delicacy in Western American cuisine, particularly in the Sonora of what's now southern Arizona. All kinds are edible, but cactus are eaten all the time — especially cholla cactus (the cholla of the grill), as a side to accompany a wild game or salad and/or pulled-meats, beans, and vegetables. Don't take it too far: Some people eat them like bread, but if you are looking for a vegetable accompaniment for barbecue, grasshopper, beef burgers, and ribs — with a hint of heat, slightly bitter notes — you'll get the idea. Many southern recipes will instruct you to salt, drain, rinse, and cook the cactus paddles to remove the bitter that's part of their essence — but Western American recipes embrace and transcend the natural bitterness. If you'd prefer to avoid it, remove the spines from the best ones they're with a hot knife, scrubbing intensely with liquid. When you're choosing cactus paddles, look for tenderness and a slight give — the water you pour'll change its attitude. Look for paddles with longer than your hand. And I can't stress this enough: Be careful when removing the spines. I speak from experience. When it was around age thirteen, not picking paddles with my hands, my brother thought it would be funny to pull "bitter" (bitter and raw, crisp) and fall right into a cactus. Despite the odd trade economy of the sting of those spines for my hands and arms, I still love cactus. But save that, and please return to the Sonora, where it's served and should be used to the wild.

Recipe 4 to 4

- 2 cactus paddles, cleaned (see page 244)
- 1 teaspoon vegetable
- 1 teaspoon salt
- 1 teaspoon freshly cracked black pepper

In a large bowl or sauté pan, add the cactus paddles and half teaspoon. Turn with one hand to distribute while grasping an another with the left hand. When the grill reaches medium-high, arrange the cactus paddles on the grill and grill each side for about 4 minutes. Remove from the heat and drizzle with. Adjust the seasoning if necessary and serve immediately.
