Continuity and change

*The evolution of the British planning system, 1947–97

The modern British planning system reached its half century in 1997. During that period, the five basic legislative principles established by the Town and Country Planning Act 1947 have remained substantially unaltered yet the social, political and economic contexts of the planning system have changed considerably. The result has been a radical change in planning practice, from being a uniform, comprehensive system to one which is much more diverse in its aims and methods. The paper examines the evolution of the planning system and questions why the legislative principles were able to remain constant in the context of such change.

Fifty years ago, on 8 August 1947, the Town and Country Planning Act 1947 received the Royal Assent. The appointed day for its coming into operation came the following 1 July when virtually the whole of the previous planning legislation was repealed and a new, comprehensive and universal system of land use planning was established for England and Wales. The new Act was paralleled by a separate Town and Country Planning (Scotland) Act 1947 after some debate as to whether there should be a single Act for Great Britain.

By this Act, according to Wilfred Burns, former Chief Planner in the Department of the Environment, 'the planning system was given by Parliament to local authorities' (Burns, 1976, 684). Five basic principles were established for control of the development and use of land through the new planning system, and these were:

Paper submitted August 1997 and accepted November 1997.

*This is a revised and extended version of the paper presented at the National Planning Conference and Exhibition 1997 of the Royal Town Planning Institute in Edinburgh on 12 June 1997, under the title, 'Fifty years of planning achievements—the evolution of the planning system since 1947', celebrating the Fiftieth Anniversary of the 1947 Town and Country Planning Act. The Act came into effect on the appointed day of 1 July 1948.

Town Planning in Britain Since 1900 Gordon E. Cherry, 1991-01-16 This book examines town and country planning policy in twentieth century Britain as an important aspect of state activity Tracing the origins of planning ideals and practice Gordon Cherry charts the adoption by state both at the central and local level of measures to control and regulate features of Britain's urban and rural environments The author examines how town planning first took root as a professional activity and an academic discipline around the turn of the last century largely as a reaction to the apparent problems of the late Victorian city He shows too that this impetus for change coincided with a new perception amongst political thinkers of state planning as a legitimate and necessary function of Government's intervention in social and economic affairs Town planning as a state activity in land use regulation housing industrial location roads and transport became an important beneficiary of these developments The book highlights developments in planning policy over subsequent decades The final part of the book focuses on the breakdown of consensus from the mid 1970s and how the new market orthodoxy has affected planning policy in the 1980s and 1990s
