

BOXING ANATOMY

The insertion of the neck grommet provides support and shock absorber. They help you wear an opponent who grabs your neck, and they can help you breathe during forward grappling and backfist work.

The glutes and the calf muscles support the core, helping control the body.

The temporalis anterior and posterior muscles allow the jaw to move in a variety of directions.

The latissimus dorsi acts as the main power body you pull your opponent toward you with your hands. When you strike, these muscles contract and help you maintain the force of the hit as a function of your fighting strategy.

The biceps brachii, brachialis, and other arm flexor muscles help you pull your opponent toward you or strike him, depending on the position of the arm.

The low back muscles provide the base to all an opponent will eventually be leaning forward against, but it's your abdominal strength and core that prevent these forces.

The gluteus maximus and gluteus medius (paired with iliacus) are primarily responsible for controlling the body when standing on one leg.

The gluteus medius muscles control the hip, working in concert to produce the gait. A strong core aids in anchoring, and using the core aids in anchoring, resulting in one leg, and ultimately control.

The quadriceps, like the latissimus dorsi, help to lift the body up, forward, and backward as well.

The quadriceps also provide for your ability to maintain your body in an upright position during punching.

The upper part of the respiratory system is the trachea, which is a tube of cartilage.

The diaphragm allows the air to move in multiple directions. It plays a fundamental role in maintaining posture, and the respiratory system provides oxygen to the body.

The anterior deltoids, pectoralis major, and serratus anterior muscles help you push and pull the upper body, providing the power of the offensive jab.

The cervical vertebrae provide the structure for the neck, supporting the weight of the head and allowing for rotation.

The neck muscles, including the longus colli and longus capitis, support the head and allow for rotation.

The biceps brachii muscles allow the arm to flex, bringing the hand toward the shoulder.

The gluteus maximus, the largest muscle in the body, is responsible for extending the hip and controlling the body's position.

The adductors are muscles in the inner thigh that help control the leg during boxing, such as when stepping side to side.

The hip flexors are muscles that allow you to lift your leg and move forward.

The hamstrings, like the quadriceps, help to lift the body up, forward, and backward as well.

The quadriceps muscles control the knee. They are particularly important for driving the knee forward during a jab.

The muscles of the hand and wrist, including the flexor digitorum profundus and superficialis, are essential for the boxing stance.
