

The agricultural revolution

The invention of agriculture and livestock breeding in the Neolithic (10,000 BC) was one of the key transformations in the history of humanity. For the first time, human beings developed permanent settlement patterns and became productive groups growing their own food. They stopped depending on what their surroundings offered them and started intervening in the production process. Gradually, they created a specialization in the creation of tools and in division of tasks.

Food in the village

The division of work in a subsisting for tens of families settlements. Agriculture and stockbreeding require differentiated tasks that were achieved through the year. Sowing and harvesting were the moments of greatest activity. Parallel to this, villagers added the grain, produced the containers to keep them, sheared the lambs and processed their wool.

Sowing
Sowing the grain involved hand or from the hand.

Harvesting
That required the correct handling of wheat and barley.

Shearing
This performed the shearing for those of livestock.

1 Production cycle
The first step was to sow the seeds in the field in order to get the grain to grow and have that of the grain was ready to be harvested, the other was sowing in order to have the next year.

2 Stockbreeding
The second step was to raise livestock in the field. This was done by feeding them with the grain and the wool that they produced. The animals were sheared and used for other tasks.

3 Processing
The third step was to process the grain and wool. This was done by grinding the grain into flour and spinning the wool into yarn. The wool was then used to make clothes and other items.

4 The year
The year was divided into different seasons. The first was the sowing season, followed by the growing season, the harvest season, and the shearing season. Each season had its own tasks and activities.

Wool tasks
The wool was used for many different purposes. It was used to make clothes, blankets, and other items. The wool was also used to make ropes and other items.

Wool processing
The wool was processed in different ways. It was washed, carded, and spun into yarn. The yarn was then used to make clothes and other items.
