Can Too Much TV Ground You for Life? Television and Child Outcomes Samrat Bhattacharya,Abdul Munasib,2007 The number of hours a typical child watches the television is almost double the suggested guideline by American Academy of Pediatrics AAP A very large number of studies have claimed an adverse effect of television on children and teenagers In this paper we use The National Longitudinal Survey NLS a rich nationally representative data set that allows us to observe the inter temporal variations in television viewing behavior and the child outcome measures Unlike the previous studies we account for unobservables at the family and the child level and find that hours of television viewing does not have any effect on Body Mass Index or reading and mathematics test scores Only in case of behavioral problems television does have an adverse effect but the magnitude is small Despite the conventional wisdom and the ongoing populist movement towards proactive policies these findings suggest that an emphasis on policies based on existing studies may be premature
