

Latin American Perspectives on the Urban Century

Planning Challenges and Opportunities

by
Clara Irazábal

The 21st century is the urban century. The share of the world's population living in cities is expected to rise to 80% by 2050, from 55% in 2022.¹ Resource-efficient cities will be critical to managing material consumption and providing quality of life to billions of urban dwellers. Latin American Perspectives (LAP) has contributed to the widening discussion about urban planning in the region, particularly with a few special issues, titled "Urban Latin America: Violence, Enclaves, and Struggles for Land" (2013, Tom Angotti, issue editor) and "Planning Latin American Cities" Parts 2 and 3: "Dependencies and 'Best Practices'" and "Housing and Citizenship" (44:2 and 44:3, 2017; Tom Angotti and Clara Irazábal, issue editors). However, more must be done to shed light on planning challenges and opportunities in the region. At LAP's 50th anniversary, I pose this as a critical task for LAP's future. As Latin America (LA) has one of the most urbanized populations in the world (82%)² and its cities are concentrated in areas of high vulnerability to environmental and climate hazards,³ the mitigation of urban socio-spatial inequality and improvements to sustainability emerge as the most pressing and challenging planning issues for the region.

Urban planning in Latin American cities has been shaped by many factors, including its indigenous heritage, colonial and imperial histories, and, more recently, neoliberalism, rapid urbanization, economic and spatial inequality, neo-imperial dependencies, extractivism, and political corruption and instability. As a result, many Latin American cities face challenges, including poverty eradication and inequality mitigation; climate change and risk adaptation, mitigation, and resilience; intersectoral and interscalar governance; territorial planning and growth management; inclusionary and affordable housing; governance, the rule of law, and inclusion; conviviality and urban security; service provision and management; accessibility and multimodal mobility; neighborhood rehabilitation and preservation; migration integration; and public health.⁴ These planning challenges, however large and seemingly intractable, can and have been turned into opportunities in LA cities. These are some examples:

Clara Irazábal holds a PhD in Architecture from the University of California at Berkeley and is the Urban Studies and Planning Program Director at the University of Maryland, College Park. She is a Participating Editor of Latin American Perspectives. She thanks Ph.D. candidate Nohely Alvarez for her bibliographic support.
