

TV Listings Magazine produces weekly television guides for local papers. The Company was established in Boston in 1973 by two partners in order to take advantage of the opportunities created by newly developed technologies in computerized printing. At the same time, the widespread deployment of cable-TV systems in the 1970s generated a demand by local newspapers for a centralized listings producer. The proliferation of cable channels greatly complicated the listings task facing local newspapers. Small cities that in the 1960s might typically have had only two or three TV channels had as many as sixty by the early 1980s. Since the majority of these new offerings were either national pay services (e.g., HBO, Showtime), national superstations (WTBS, WPIX) or specialty national "basic" channels (Arts and Entertainment, Nashville, the Discovery Channel), national centralized listing production services began to enjoy a distinct advantage over local newspapers services.

The weekly guides offered by TV Listings Magazines consisted of three distinct parts. The first, the story book, was a TV-magazine section of 16 pages (magazine page components must be included in multiples of four pages since they are produced by folding larger sheets in two with two sides for each fold) containing stories and pictures on upcoming TV features (e.g., movies' plots summaries and ratings), stars and items of current TV interest (e.g., a story on violence in children's TV programming). This part of the guide was similar to the front section of TV Guide and was common to all editions of the guide. It was printed on expensive coated paper and contained color photographs. The second part of each guide, known as the program book, consisted of program listings which were specific to each edition (an "edition" being the guide for a particular local newspaper). This part of the guide contained both text and pictures (the pictures being associated with advertising) but was printed in black and white on newsprint. The program book, like the story book, had to be produced in multiples of four pages. Finally, each guide included a cover-piece of four pages which, as the name
