Quick Lube Franchise Corporation (QLFC)

Preparation Questions

1. What grounds might QLFC have for filing a lawsuit against Huston?
2. Why do you think Huston has asked for a meeting with Hergert?
3. What advice would you give Hergert as he considers Huston's request for a meeting with QLFC?
4. As part of that advice, how much is QLFC worth?
5. Does your answer to Question 4 depend on how QLFC is harvested?

It had been a year since Huston, a major oil company, had bought 80 percent of Super Lube, Inc., the number one franchisor of quick lubrication and oil-change service centers in the United States with 1,000 outlets. As a result of that takeover, Super Lube's largest franchisee, Quick Lube Franchise Corporation (QLFC) found itself in the position where its principal supplier, lead financing vehicle, and franchisor were the same entity. Was this an opportunity or a disaster? In April 1991, Frank Hergert, founder, chairman, and CEO of QLFC was faced with one of the most important decisions of his life.

Historical Background

Super Lube was the innovator of the quick lube concept, servicing the lube, motor oil, and filter needs of motorists in a specialized building with highly refined procedures. It was founded in March 1979 by Jeff Martin. Frank Hergert was one of the four founding members of Martin's team. After a few years, Hergert became frustrated with life at the franchisor's headquarters in Dallas. He believed that the future of Super Lube was in operating service centers. That put him at odds with founder, Chairman, and CEO Jeff Martin who was passionately committed to franchising service centers as fast as possible. Martin and Hergert had known each other for a long time so they sought a mutually acceptable way to resolve their differences. Their discussions quickly resulted in the decision that Hergert would buy a company-owned service center in northern California by swapping his Super Lube founder's stock valued at $64,000, which he had purchased originally for $13,000. Quick Lube Franchise Corporation was founded.

Early Success and Growth

Success in his first service center inspired growth. Eventually, QLFC controlled service center development and operating rights to a geographic area covering parts of California and Washington with the potential for over 90 service centers. Hergert's long-term goal was to build QLFC into a big chain of Super Lube service centers that would have a public stock offering or merge with a larger company (Exhibits A and B).

Hergert financed QLFC's growth with both equity and debt (Exhibits C and D). Most of the additional equity came from former Super Lube employees who left the franchisor to join QLFC in senior management positions. They purchased stock in QLFC with cash realized by selling their stock in Super Lube. A key member of Hergert's team was Mark Roberts, who had been Super Lube's CFO until 1986. He brought much needed financial sophistication to QLFC.

The primary debt requirement was for financing new service centers. In 1991, the average cost of land acquisition and construction had risen to $750,000 per service center from about $350,000 10 years earlier.

Growth was originally achieved through off-balance-sheet real estate partnerships. An Oregon bank lent about $4 million and a Texas bank lent almost $3 million. However, rapid growth wasn't possible until QLFC struck a deal with Huston Oil for $6.5 million of subordinated debt. The Huston debt was 8 percent interest—only for 5 years and then amortized on a straight line basis in years 6 through 10. The real estate developed with the Huston financing was kept in the company. QLFC was contractually committed to purchasing Huston products.
