

PHYSICAL EXAMINATION

- Clinicians may request for physical examination in relation to medical conditions sometimes associated with certain psychological disorders.
- If the current drug abuse or medical condition exists, clinicians must ascertain whether it is merely COEXISTING or is CAUSAL, usually by looking at the onset of the problem.

BEHAVIORAL ASSESSMENT

Behavioral Assessment – using direct observation to formally assess an individual's thought, feelings, and behaviors in specific situations or context.

- It can be used to assess people who lack the ability of self-reporting (e.g., children).
- The goal is to determine the factors that significantly influence the identified target behaviors.
- Naturalistic observations are essential, but sometimes it is impractical; thus, simulation becomes an alternative option.

ABC's of Observation – the usual focus is on here and now; attentions are directed towards the antecedents (what happened just before the behavior), the behavior itself, and its consequences (what happened afterwards).

Informal Observation – relies on the observer's recollections and interpretations of the events.

Formal Observation – involves identifying behaviors that are observable and measurable (operational definitions).

- The goal is to determine whether a pattern of behaviors exist and design a treatment based on these patterns.

Self-Monitoring – allowing the person to observe their own in order to identify the severity of their problems and the factors influence their behaviors.

Checklists & Behavior Rating Scales – a formal way of observing behaviors used before and periodically during treatment to assess changes in behavior.

Reactivity – changes in one's behavior caused by observation of oneself or other people (e.g., clinicians). It can distort observational data.

PSYCHOLOGICAL TESTING

Standardized Psychological Tests – tools that determine cognitive, emotional, and behavioral responses that may be associated with specific disorder, as well as longstanding personality features.

Neuropsychological Tests – used to determine the possible contributions of brain damage or cognitive dysfunction to the patient's condition.

- Use to observe the effects of brain dysfunction on a person's ability to perform certain tasks (you can't see the damage but you can observe its effect).

Projective Tests – tools that utilize ambiguous stimuli to reveal a person's unconscious thoughts; people project their own personalities and fears to other people or things (e.g., TAT, Rorschach Inkblots).

Personality Inventories – based on the concept that people with similar disorder tend to answer, as a group, in a certain way. This pattern may predict who else has the disorder (e.g., MMPI).

- The contents of questions are irrelevant; the pattern of answering is the significant factor.
- If a person's pattern of answering is similar to those who have the disorder, that person may be diagnosed with the same disorder as well.
- These tests were the product of empirical approach – collection & evaluation of large-scale data.

Intelligence Tests – used to assess the intellectual capability and functioning of a person. It was originally created to assess the children's performance in school.

- Stanford-Binet Test – developed by Alfred Binet & Theodore Simon and was later translated and revised by Lewis Terman for use in USA.

→ Originally uses Ratio Intelligence Quotient (IQ) –
$$IQ = \frac{\text{Mental Age}}{\text{Chronological Age}} \times 100 = IQ \text{ Score}$$

→ Current tests now use Deviation Intelligence Quotient (IQ) – a person's score is compared only with scores of other in the same age. Score on test is standardized with a $\mu = 100$ and $\sigma = 15$ or 16 .

- Wechsler Intelligence Tests – developed by David Wechsler, these tests contain verbal scales and performance scales.
