

misunderstandings of what open source software is and how it can be gainfully deployed.²⁹ In 2009, then-acting DoD CIO David Wennergren published a memorandum, “Clarifying Guidance Regarding Open Source Software,” in which he enumerated the advantages of open source software and explained the existing policies surrounding its execution in an effort to clarify “misconceptions and misinterpretations of the existing laws, policies, and regulations” that had “hampered effective DoD use and development of OSS,” or open source software.³⁰

Senior Pentagon leaders are currently focused on developing innovation, maintaining technological superiority, and managing costs, as outlined in policies such as the DoD’s “Better Buying Power” series. The DoD has an IT budget of over $38 billion for FY17, and given the amount of code it develops for programs from weapons systems to travel-booking systems, the Department can naturally benefit from proven open source advantages such as reuse and code quality.³¹ But despite this, there has been very little to no discussion of how the DoD can systematically incorporate open source software into the products it develops, and no specific mention of open source methods or licensing in programs of record in recent years.

U.S. Airmen from the 163rd Maintenance Group, which is a part of the California Air National Guard and primarily involved in the Predator missions, train on a ground control station. The Predator drone runs on the open source operating system Linux. (Vital Gamis/U.S. Air Force)

Defense-Specific Use Cases of Open Source Software

Considering the DoD’s top-down apathy toward and difficulty with using open source methods, one glaring question remains: Why is there continued bottom-up support for open source software and methods within the DoD? In addition to universal benefits, open source software contributes distinct value to the Department, given its mission and organizational constraints. The following are six clear cases in which open source software provides specific advantages to the DoD.

Better Platform To Build To

The DoD and its industry partners build a significant amount of specialized software, from simple mobile apps for training to the Distributed Common Ground System, the U.S. Army’s intelligence fusion application.³² Leveraging open source platforms such as operating systems, databases, middleware, and toolkits allows the DoD to deploy and maintain software more quickly and flexibly than proprietary alternatives. For example, the Persistent Close Air Support system developed by DARPA runs on Android. General Atomics drones, including the Predator and Reaper, and ground stations operate on Linux, a switch that was made after Windows-based systems proved vulnerable to malware such as keyloggers, software that captures a user’s keystrokes.³³ Deploying custom applications on open source platforms has the potential to allow the DoD to more rapidly develop, utilize, and deploy military-unique software at lower cost.

Simpler Interagency Collaboration

The opportunity to improve software across all federal agencies is at the heart of the White House’s Open Source Software Policy initiative. Because they have fewer proprietary restrictions, or in many cases none at all, open source systems are easier to use when multiple agencies need to collaborate or share code seamlessly. The nature of the DoD’s mission means it is exposed to the most demanding technical challenges and threats. Concomitantly, the DoD is better resourced to develop technology than virtually anywhere else in government. Sharing quality software with the rest of the U.S. government would support the DoD’s cyber mission to “defend the homeland and U.S. national interests against cyberattacks of significant consequence.”³⁴ For example, the NSA recently open sourced the Systems Integrity Management Platform, a security compliance toolkit, to help others avoid duplication and to improve the quality
