

Change Levels

Large change initiatives occur at three different levels. When creating change management strategy and plans, we as leaders need to identify strategies for moving people and processes through each level in order to mitigate resistance and failure points. Each level of change management increases in difficulty; thus, planning must begin well in advance of executing the change plan. When drafting a change management strategy, always consider the scale of the change in order to identify whom within the organization will be affected.

Individual Change Management	Individual change management, also called “people change management,” requires an understanding of how people experience change and the support they will need to adapt to the change successfully.
Initiative Change Management	Initiative change, also called “process change management,” typically involves large projects that will impact hundreds or thousands of people within an organization.
Enterprise-Wide Management	Enterprise change management involves a holistic change of an entire organization. Usually, this type of change occurs when an organization needs to create drastic competitive differentiation in order to effectively adapt to the ever-changing competitive landscape.
