

Recognition of progress made – this could be milestones met on longer-term projects that impact the wider business

Recognition of results on an end product – this could be how the task has been completed and the way it was handled

Recognising employees who embody company values – for your employees who live and breathe your company values

1 in 3 people leave an organisation because they feel they are simply not recognised.

Now, let's take a look at rewarding your team. Where does it come into play?

Although reward and recognition can be used interchangeably, it's important to learn how each function works separately within the workplace.

Rewards are often set up by the company to acknowledge and motivate your employees who do a great job or go above and beyond in their role. Unlike recognition, rewards for your employees are more likely to have a monetary cost to the business. "It's not a monetary gift, but it's a monetary cost to the business."

What is reward and recognition?

Before we dive in, let's go back to basics and break it down.

Reward and recognition can be defined as the activity we engage in to acknowledge exceptional performance and encourage specific values or behaviours within the workplace.

Employee recognition is when you acknowledge any positive contributions an employee makes to their team or the business as a whole. This can include their unique contribution, expertise, character, efforts and dedication to their work, or to achieving business results. Recognition can be given by both employers and employees and can do wonders for improving workplace culture and morale.

Let's break employee recognition down even further. What are the different types of employee recognition in the workplace?

Personal recognition – the acknowledgement of individual expertise, unique talents and qualities of your employees

Recognition of work practices – such as demonstrations of creativity, innovation and improvements from your employees

Recognition of dedication to work – your employees showcase quality contributions to your business objectives they should be rewarded
