

Nature vs. Nurture

Biologists believe in nature-nurture differences, mostly genetic differences, that may contribute to many behaviors. In other words, people's actions are determined by their DNA differences. But it's difficult to determine whether nature or nurture is responsible for a behavior. For example, intelligence is a complex trait that is probably influenced by both the individual's genes and environment. Although scientists have identified some genetic differences with intelligence, biologists generally agree that both nature and nurture cause people's behaviors. Intelligence is a complex trait that is probably influenced by both genes and nurture, but with the environment playing a major role.
