

Nature vs. Nurture

Biologists believe that environmental influences modify genetic inheritance. They also believe that many behaviors are determined by a combination of inheritance and environmental influences. In fact, a combination of both is often the most accurate description of human behavior. Some have said, "everything is determined by the way the environment affects a combination of inherited characteristics from the individual and influences from other people."

Biologists believe that both genes and environment cause people who they are. Genetic inheritance provides the blueprint for creating a human body that can survive, but without environmental input, inheritance would be useless. Behavior does not just come from inheritance; environmental influences also play a role. In fact, the environment is often the most important factor in determining how a person's genetic inheritance is expressed. In fact, the environment can be so powerful that it can even change the genetic inheritance of a person's offspring. For example, a person's environment can affect the expression of a gene, which can then be passed on to the next generation.
