LEARNING OUTCOMES

- To be able to describe current models of grief.
- To be aware of the mental health problems that result from bereavement.
- To understand the impact of bereavement upon people with existing mental health problems.
- To be able to consider interventions, including counselling, for people experiencing bereavement and loss.

SUMMARY OF KEY POINTS

- Bereavement and grief are not illnesses – they are a normal part of the human experience.
- Bereavement can sometimes become complicated and lead to mental health difficulties, and bereavement can be more problematic for people with existing mental health problems.
- There are different approaches to bereavement, and more recent models have moved away from the idea of 'moving on' to the concept of maintaining a bond with the deceased person.
- Most people who are bereaved do not necessarily need or benefit from counselling.
- Providing support to those who are bereaved requires basic counselling skills along with an appreciation of the process of grief.

If you listen long enough and are open and nonjudgmental you will hear at least one story from each person about something 'weird' and unexplainable that connects them with the one who died. It's there. They may not choose to disclose it for fear of ridicule.
