Abstract: Background: Adolescents' use of step tracker mobile applications (apps) could be influenced by their assessment of the mobile app used. Objectives: To analyze differences in the dropout rate, app assessment, and problematic mobile phone use based on prior physical activity levels and the app used. Methods: A study with a quasi-experimental design was carried out with the participation of 240 adolescents, who were further categorized as either active or inactive. The adolescents carried out a 10-week intervention promoted as a part of the physical education curriculum, three days a week, in which they randomly used the Pokémon Go, MapMyWalk, Pacer, or Strava mobile apps after school for cardiorespiratory training. Results: The results showed a higher dropout rate from Pokémon Go in the group of inactive adolescents ($p = 0.012$). No differences were found in the assessment of apps based on the level of activity of the adolescents, neither overall nor when analyzing this question based on the app used ($p > 0.05$). As for problematic mobile phone use, only previously inactive adolescents assigned to the Pacer group significantly increased their final score after the intervention ($p = 0.044$), with no changes being identified in the other groups or apps ($p > 0.05$). Furthermore, the active adolescents showed a positive relationship between the volume of training and problematic mobile phone use ($p = 0.023$), specifically with the conflicting use of this device ($p = 0.017$). Conclusions: The inactive adolescents had a higher dropout rate when using Pokémon Go. There were no differences in app assessment between the active and the inactive participants. However, the active adolescents showed a link between their training volume and problematic mobile phone use.

1. Introduction

Adolescence is a decisive stage for the establishment of healthy lifestyle habits [1] and for the prevention of chronic diseases [2,3]. Among the most important healthy habits, the practice of physical activity is considered fundamental for the maintenance of physical fitness [4], for the improvement of body composition [5], and for a healthier psychological state [6]. However, recent studies show that the abandonment of physical activity is increasing among adolescents, with up to 81% of adolescents not meeting the minimum physical activity recommendations established by the World Health Organization (WHO) [7].
