Navigating between Improvement and Habitation: Countermovements in Housing and Urban Infrastructure in Vienna

Abstract

This article investigates the history of housing and urban infrastructure in Vienna by analysing the dialectics between improvement and habitation. It will discuss countermovements seeking for habitation in five historical periods: an anti-liberal countermovement (Vienna before 1918), a social-democratic countermovement (Red Vienna, 1919-1934), fascist countermovements (1934-1945), the institutionalisation of the social-democratic countermovement (1945-1989), and its erosion (1989 onwards). This historical analysis demonstrates the ambivalence of anti-market countermovements, as they are not unconditionally promoting holistic forms of social cohesion, peaceful communal life, and emancipation. Improvement is not always destructive and habitation not always unifying. Their outcomes depend on their specific form of implementation and framing. The article ends with a reflection on how to navigate between improvement and habitation today.

1. Introduction

In the “socialist municipality” that was later called Red Vienna (1919-1934), Karl Polanyi felt at home (Dale 2010, p. 379). He was impressed by its cultural achievements to offer “freedom for all” and “experienced an epiphany akin to that which George Orwell described ten years later in Barcelona: suddenly, workers ‘looked you in the face and treated you as an equal’” (Dale 2016a, p. 100). Polanyi’s daughter, Kari Polanyi Levitt (1990, p. 123), is convinced “that the shock of the passage from Red Vienna to the slums of Britain [...] burnt into his consciousness – as it did in mine” which explains “the passion in the pages of The Great Transformation that accuse the owning classes of sacrificing ‘Habitation for Improvement’”.

In this article, we will investigate the history of Vienna by dwelling more systematically on the dialectics between improvement and habitation. Polanyi ([1944] 2001, p. 35ff) describes the drama
