

Background

The Tuluo Tuluo is the world's largest building made of rammed ear-earth. With retaining and preserving traditional ear-earth construction techniques, the Tuluo Tuluo also inherits the essence of traditional Chinese culture and is a testimony to the cultural wisdom of living together in a community. It creates a unique experience of the art of ear-earth architecture. The Tuluo is a self-contained, economical, environmentally friendly, durable, decorative and light-colored type of ear-earth high-rise building that firmly uses the concept of least of the structure and local building materials such as ear-earth, bricks and pebbles.

The people of Hubei feel a sense of pride between the Han and Chao people, combining traditional and modern architecture and the natural environment, creating a unique style of ear-earth architecture.

In order to survive, the people of Hubei built ear-earth buildings with both residential and commercial functions along with the different geographical environment of the area. The structural approach is a combination of retaining the ear-earth with ear-earth and building the water from inside the building.

In 1988, Tuluo Tuluo was listed as a UNESCO World Heritage Site. The Tuluo Tuluo is a unique architectural achievement in the world for its large-scale rammed ear-earth construction, which is of national and international value.

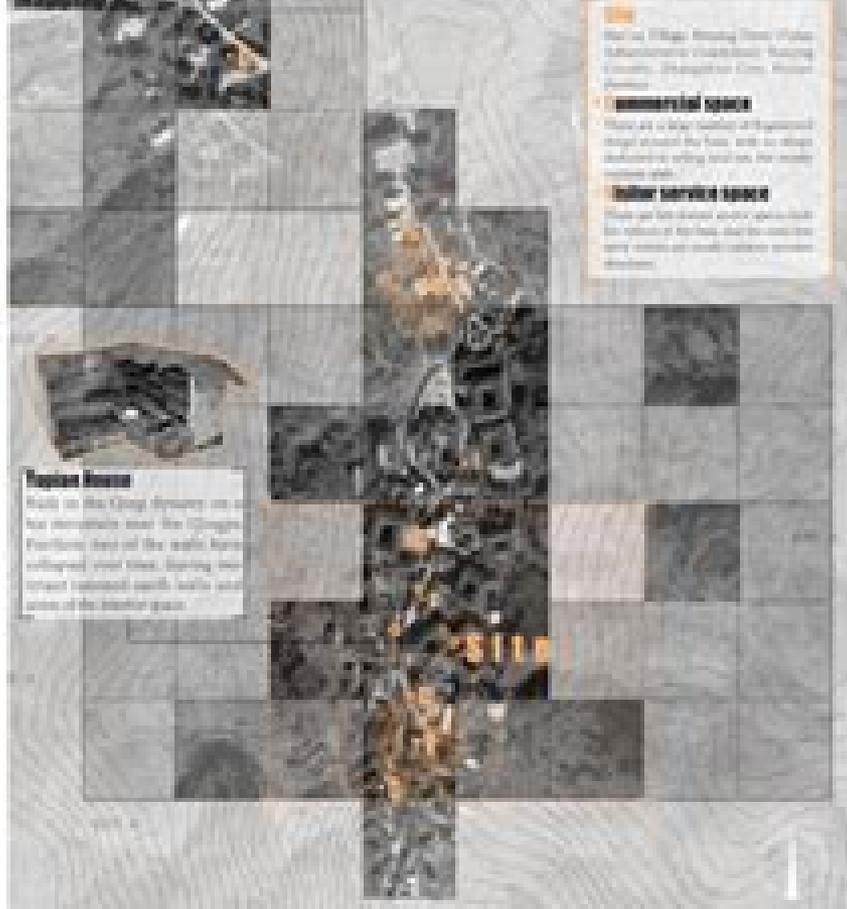

Many of these buildings are no longer inhabited, and some have begun to collapse due to the deterioration of materials. The number of old citizens who know the art of building and retaining tuluo is dwindling and there is not time to bring the world heritage site
