Birmingham at War, 1939-45 Julie Phillips,2018-04-30 Barely 17 years after the Great War that had brought Britain to its knees the country was once again asked to make sacrifices and give their all to the war effort With its strong industrial background Birmingham was already geared to help manufacture the vehicles that could be adapted for war use and with the threat of the German Luftwaffe screaming across the skies it was only right that the production of planes most notably the spitfire was ramped up to help protect the British public While many of its men and women were involved in the forces abroad many more stayed behind to defend the city with inhabitants risking their lives by taking up fire hoses first aid kits manning anti-aircraft guns and positioning barrage balloons in order to save others from the devastating destruction of the Blitz Meanwhile the city's children were separated from their families to escape the worst of the bombing and would return from their adventures changed not all host evacuee families were as kind or as welcoming to their charges as it would appear Yet not everyone was so patriotic and keen to do their bit and the opportunity for crime and to fiddle the rations with black market goods was rife Not even Government issue equipment was off limits as one Birmingham gang of sandbag thieves demonstrated For Birmingham the Second World War was a time of great hardship and sacrifice and the hard work continued for many years after as its people painstakingly rebuilt parts of the bomb damaged city     Domestic Soldiers Jennifer Purcell,2010 Over 8 million women stayed at home during the Second World War This title presents an account of the lives of six ordinary women who are made extraordinary by the demands of war     The Dales Kate Rathbone,1989
