

■ INTRODUCTION

Laparoscopic urological surgery can be divided into three areas:

1. Diagnostic
2. Extirpative
3. Reconstructive

Because much of urologic surgery is reconstructive and radiologic imaging techniques continue to refine the accuracy of urologic diagnoses, the role of laparoscopy in urologic practice has decreased in the past few years. However, there are specific areas of urologic surgery in which laparoscopic applications have expanded. Laparoscopy is used extensively in pediatric urology for the diagnosis and operative correction of undescended testis, as well as the laparoscopic removal of obstructed and nonfunctioning kidneys. Another major surgery is laparoscopic adrenalectomy for both benign and malignant disease of the adrenal gland.

■ LAPAROSCOPIC VARICOCELECTOMY

Laparoscopic varicocele ligation is performed by many urologists and reports from several medical centers have been published. The data suggest that laparoscopic varicocele ligation is therapeutically superior to open surgical and radiographic (embolization) techniques. Laparoscopic varicocelectomy appears to reduce postoperative morbidity. Whether it is necessary to identify and preserve the testicular artery during laparoscopic varicocelectomy, it remains controversial. Loughlin and Brooks reported on the use of a laparoscopic Doppler probe that they believe facilitates the identification and preservation of the testicular artery. Matsuda et al. claim that the testicular artery does not have to be preserved; they clip the testicular artery and veins en bloc. Further, multicenter experience is needed to resolve whether the testicular artery should be preserved during laparoscopic varicocele ligation. Because the testicular artery is preserved during open surgical repair or radiographic embolization procedures, we generally preserve the testicular artery during varicocelectomy.

Operative Technique

The technique of laparoscopic varicocele ligation is straightforward. The procedure is usually performed using general anesthesia. A urethral catheter is placed to empty the bladder and a Veress needle is placed at the umbilicus to inflate the peritoneal cavity with carbon dioxide. Alternatively, the open technique can be performed at the inferior margin of the umbilicus and the trocar can be placed into the peritoneum under direct vision. Three laparoscopic ports are placed for varicocelectomy according to baseball diamond concept.

The retroperitoneal vas deferens can be identified and the spermatic cord joining the spermatic cord above the internal inguinal ring (Fig. 1). The gonadal vessels are visualized directly in the retroperitoneum. The posterior peritoneum is excised with cautery, laser, or endoscopic scissors. The gonadal vessels are then mobilized; however, reliably identifying the spermatic artery and its branches is sometimes difficult through the laparoscope (Figs. 2A and B). Therefore, many surgeons prefer to use the laparoscopic Doppler probe to facilitate identification of the spermatic artery during laparoscopic varicocele ligation.
