What is Architecture Diagram

An architecture is a collection of system components and their relationships. Architecture can be simply defined as a conceptual business architecture, application architecture, data architecture, and technical architecture.

- Business architecture (BA) is a methodology to determine the boundaries of the business, including the product groups. It is the plan or blueprint of the whole system implementation. It needs to capture the goal of the system, the principles of system development, and the application services at each level of the system.
- Data architecture (DA) is a set of architectural for defining data, which defines data according to system requirements and type of different data groups. For instance, all data independently, separately, relating, linked, shared, and distributed data clusters. The main goal of DA is to create a data architecture.
- Technical architecture (TA) is a methodology for defining a data architecture. The architecture defines how TA is fully consistent with which applications and systems are needed to deliver the needs of the business operations, and with which technologies you need to get throughout the full process. The technical architecture should describe the design requirements of the operational architecture, and carry out the technical details pertaining to the operational architecture. It describes the relationships between both new technology and current technology ready.

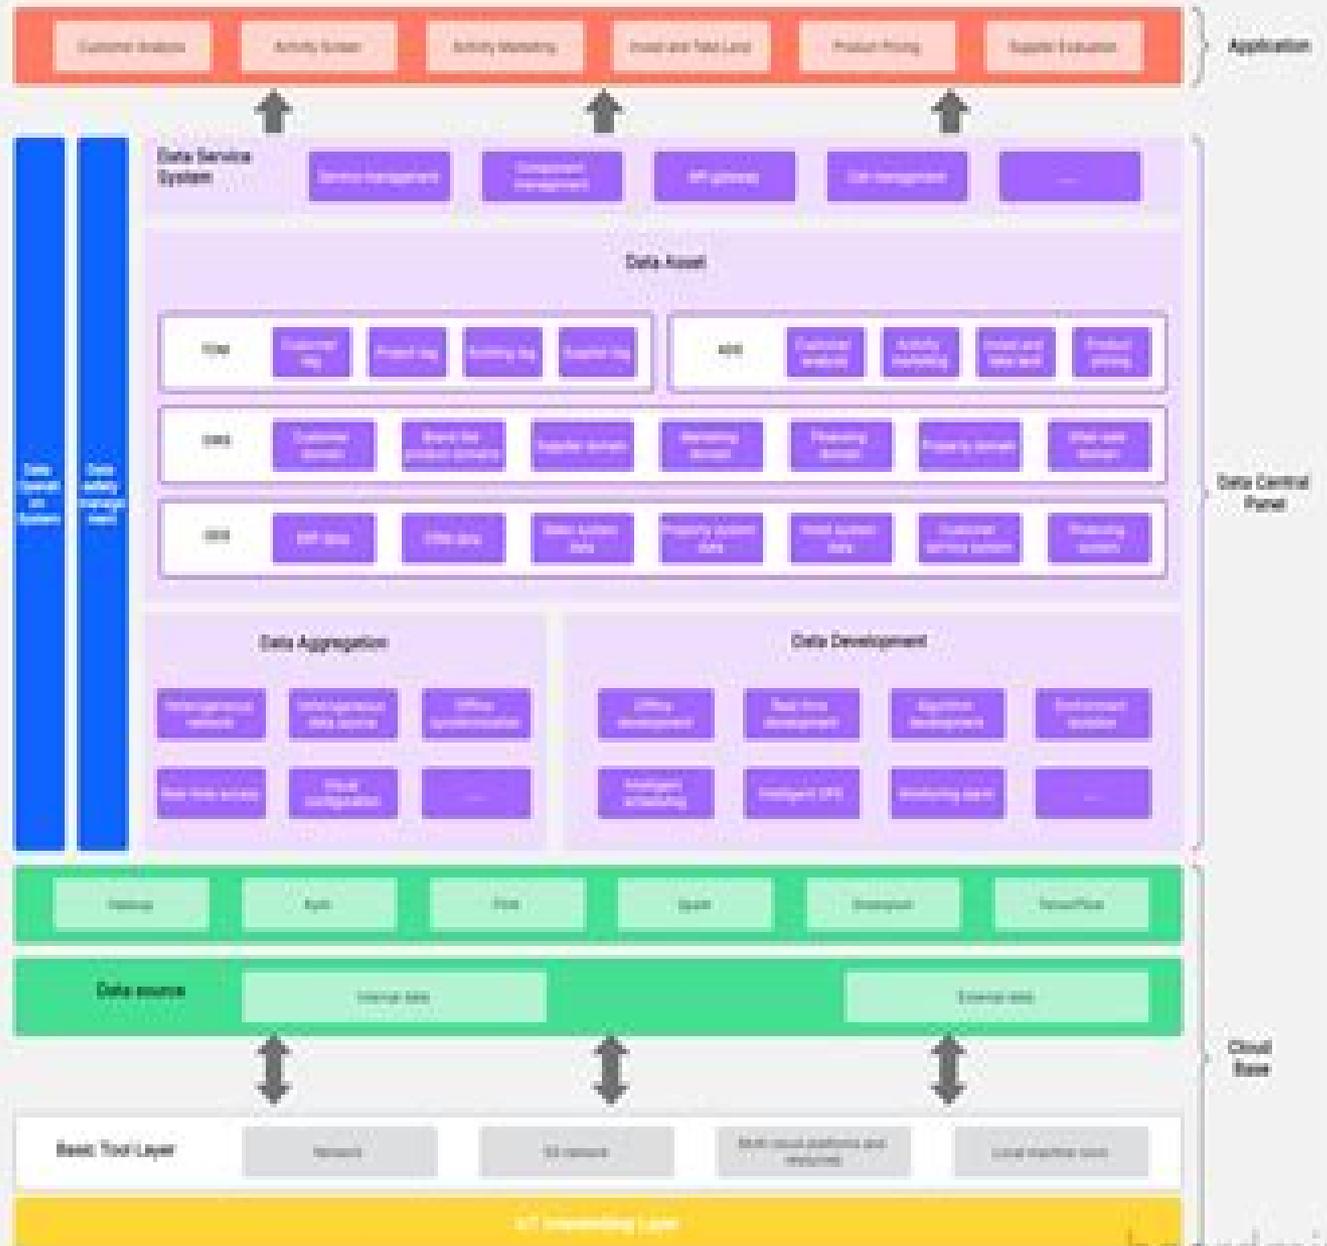

How to Draw an Architecture Diagram

- Figure out what level of architecture diagram to draw.
- Identify key elements in the architecture diagram and, possibly, sub-elements, services.
- Set out the relationships between key elements (business, support, service, etc).
- Finalize an architecture diagram with clear descriptions.
