

Writing academic English further along the road. What is happening now in EAP writing instruction?

Christopher Tribble

Approaching academic writing instruction

In an earlier Survey Review of EAP writing instruction materials for this journal (Tribble 2009), I proposed that the teaching of academic writing could be best understood in terms of three contrasting traditions: Social/Genre, Intellectual/Rhetorical, and Academic Literacies.

Social/Genre is an approach situated within an English for Specific Purposes tradition and founded on earlier work by M. A. K. Halliday and others in Register Analysis (for example Halliday, McIntosh, and Stevens 1964). The Social/Genre approach has been further elaborated by John Swales with his account of Genre (for example Swales 1988, 1990) and, more recently, by discourse analysts and corpus researchers such as Ken Hyland (for example Hyland 2000) and Hilary Nesi and Sheena Gardner (for example Nesi and Gardner 2012).

Key characteristics of this Social/Genre approach include:

- the conceptualization of disciplinary discourse communities in which there are expert and apprentice writers;
- an emphasis on the analysis of multiple exemplars of texts in their social context as a starting point for curriculum development;
- the use of move analysis as a means of understanding the structure of specific textual realizations of educational genres, and of corpus analysis in developing an understanding of the lexico-grammar of these genres;
- a recognition of the need to ensure the cooperation of disciplinary experts in EAP writing programmes; and
- the use of Vygotskian scaffolding as a core methodology.

The second tradition I identified was Intellectual/Rhetorical. This approach arose from instructional practices in North American Composition Studies (see, for example, Johns 1997) and was initially informed by Flower and Hayes' (1981) research into the cognitive processes involved in written composition. Key features of the Intellectual/Rhetorical approach include:
