

ABC of adolescence Adolescent development

Deborah Christie, Russell Winer

In the care of adolescent patients, all aspects of clinical medicine are played out against a background of rapid physical, psychological, and social developmental changes. These changes produce specific disease patterns, unusual presentations of symptoms, and above all, unique communication and management challenges. This can make working with adolescents difficult. However, with the right skills, practising medicine with young people can be rewarding and fruitful. These skills are needed by everyone who works with young people in the course of their work.

As a young person enters adolescence, their parents are still largely responsible for all aspects of their health. By the end of adolescence, health issues will be almost entirely the responsibility of the young person. The challenge is to maintain an effective clinical relationship while the health responsibilities transfer from the parents to the young person.

Specialised clinical communication skills are needed to take an accurate history, bearing in mind new life domains not applicable to children (sex, and drugs) and adding communication and engagement of the family to the standard adult consultation. Physical examinations of adolescents require considerations of privacy and personal integrity as well as requiring additional skills such as pubertal assessment. For effective treatment of illness in adolescence, doctors need to know about adolescent development if they are to manage adeptly issues of adherence (compliance), identity, consent and confidentiality, and relationships between young people and their families. Evidence from randomised controlled trials clearly shows that such skills can be developed and practised effectively in primary care.

Developmental tasks

During adolescence young people will negotiate puberty and the completion of growth, take on sexually dimorphic body shape, develop new cognitive skills (including abstract thinking capacities), develop a clearer sense of personal and sexual identity, and develop a degree of emotional, personal, and financial independence from their parents.

Developmental tasks of adolescence

	Biological	Psychological	Social
Early adolescence	Early puberty (girls: breast bud and pubic hair development, start of growth spurt; boys: testicular enlargement, start of genital growth)	Concrete thinking but early moral concepts; progression of sexual identity development (sexual orientation); possible homosexual peer interest; reassessment of body image	Emotional separation from parents; start of strong peer identification; early exploratory behaviours (smoking, violence)
Mid-adolescence	Girls: mid-late puberty and end of growth spurt; menarche; development of female body shape with fat deposition Boys: mid-puberty, spermarche and nocturnal emissions; voice breaks; start of growth spurt	Abstract thinking, but self still seen as "bullet proof"; growing verbal abilities; identification of law with morality; start of fervent ideology (religious, political)	Emotional separation from parents; strong peer identification; increased health risk (smoking, alcohol, etc); heterosexual peer interest; early vocational plans
Late adolescence	Boys: end of puberty; continued increase in muscle bulk, and body hair	Complex abstract thinking; identification of difference between law and morality; increased impulse control; further development of personal identity; further development or rejection of religious and political ideology	Development of social autonomy; intimate relationships; development of vocational capability and financial independence
