HOLLAND

ABSTRACT - In psychotherapy, the term 'forensic psychotherapy' is generally applied to the treatment of crime suspects and/or detainees. What makes it 'forensic', of course, is the focus on the criminal aspects involved and, in somewhat broader terms, on the application of civil and/or administrative law in each case. Examples of this are: court order psychiatric examination/treatment, Disablement Insurance issues, and employer/employee procedures brought for arbitration before the administrative courts. In this paper, the term 'forensic psychoanalytical psychotherapy' will focus specifically on the clinical or ambulatory psychiatric treatment of court order patients and other detainees. A largely pragmatical psychotherapy method will be discussed in terms of the borderline personality disorder, based on basic psychoanalytical techniques such as free association, transference/counter-transference, and the acknowledgement of the problem as the principal and-ingredient for entering into discussions on defence-mechanisms.

Introduction

In another paper is described how a psychosis department was set up for court order patients at the Dr. S. van Mesdag Clinic, and the subsequent changes this brought about in the treatment of psychotic behaviour in such an institution (Oei &

Van de Mark 1990). These changes concerned sociotherapy for psychotic delinquents (Oei 1992a), of which case management was an essential part, and whereby psychopharmacotherapy proved to have a positive influence on patient behaviour.
