GABLE

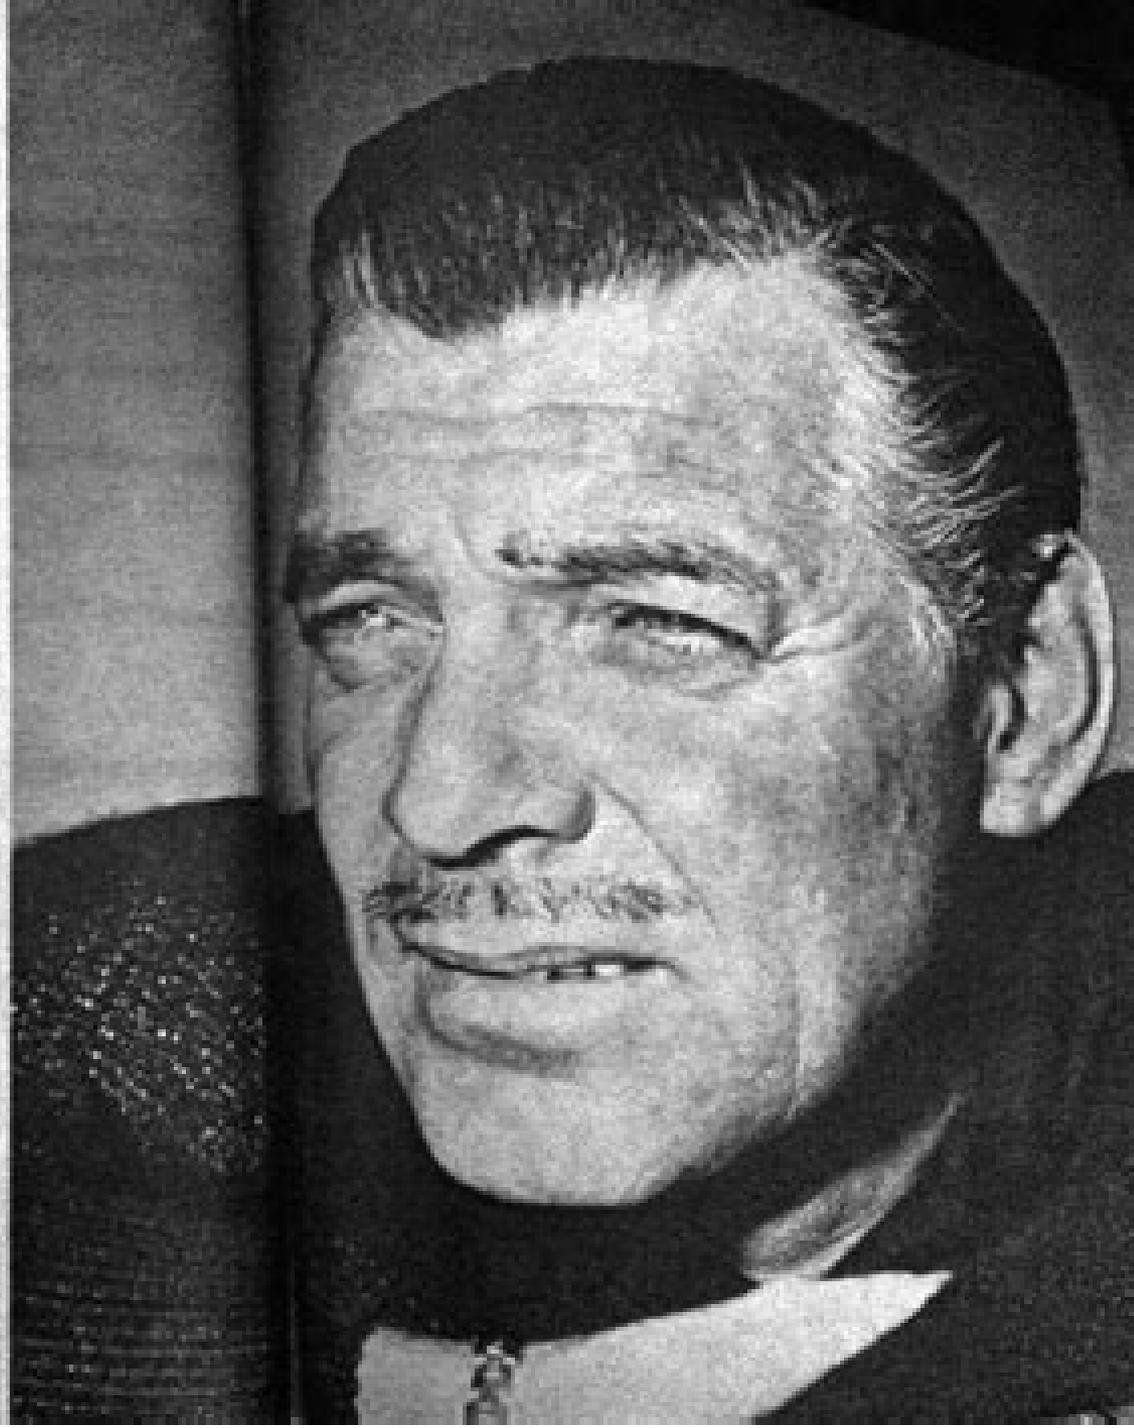

by Clark Gable

• There is an unusual morning here which comes partly generally through the State Machine in Mexico and is called "the Tiger" for the reason, three years ago, I went looking for this cat along the border between the states of Texas and Chihuahua. It is rough country and the morning, muddy and foggy, but mostly warm; our party reached a little village that would have looked so very long.

It was dark, there was no light and all the inhabitants had long since gone to bed so the few men here that make up the place. I was too tired to take further steps and was standing there wondering what to do the next when one of the men stepped forward from my shadow. That was all the time I needed. Making the bag up against a dirt wall, I checked my watch and went on along right there and then on the street. I learned that the rest of the group did the same after talking about a little and going away to get somebody up.

In the morning I was awakened by three, three sounds. Being just-ly through my window in the light tonight, I saw that I was surrounded by a ring of Mexican children, all of whom, but all perfectly well and respectful of me. When had someone see me the slipping-ness of my feet, I was looking out from the door, around like the dog. Then I saw, with hardly a glance the way, some already driving their heads out for the day's work. I looked back at the back and smiled, because that looks was really, like a man. (Continued on page 17)

This remarkable self-portrait is one of the very few stories ever to be published in any magazine, under Clark Gable's own by-line. Madam Street considers it an honor to be able to present such intimate revelations of a great star—by the man who knows him best.
