The electricity is generated by a power plant, which converts fuel into electricity. The power plant is connected to a power grid, which distributes the electricity to homes and businesses. The power grid is made up of power lines and substations. The power lines carry the electricity from the power plant to the substations, which then distribute the electricity to homes and businesses. The substations are connected to a network of power lines, which allows the electricity to be distributed to different parts of the country. The power grid is a complex system that requires a lot of investment and maintenance. The government and private sector both play a role in the electricity sector. The government is responsible for setting the rules and regulations for the electricity sector. The private sector is responsible for investing in and operating the power plants and power lines. International aid and local community investment also play a role in the electricity sector. Public-private partnerships are also a common way to finance the electricity sector. Government subsidies are often used to encourage investment in the electricity sector. Local government investment is also a common way to finance the electricity sector. Public utility companies are often responsible for operating the power lines and substations.
