

Alas, Babylon

by Pat Frank

About the Book

"In Fort Rapture, a town built in Central Florida," an early December Friday dawned warm and peaceful. There are meetings of potential crisis from the outside world. "The Russians had sent up another Sputnik, No. 15, and something serious was going on in the Middle East"—but the citizens of Fort Rapture took to their small-town preoccupations. There: Randy Dragg, the youngest son of a prominent local family—lawyer, Korean War vet, and unsuccessful candidate for the state legislature—suffers a Western Union call; from his other brother, Mark, a cadet in the Strategic Air Command; Mark's sister includes a code phrase used by the military about intelligence to indicate imminent disaster. "Alas, Babylon," Randy correctly concludes that nuclear war between the United States and the Soviet Union is in fact imminent. On Saturday morning, The Day, Randy makes for "a long, steep, perilous march" and a second nuclear phrase for the south. He begins the struggle of Fort Rapture to survive the onslaught. Against all the odds, the citizens of this small town set against the immediate and more subtle of nuclear attack, that they struggle without the secondary consequences war their own human institutions. An airplane and various supplies—first the planes themselves, then money, then gas, then electricity, then food and medicines, then running water—they cope with a world in which, in a single day, a thousand years of civilization have been stripped away. In his large house just outside town, Dragg gathers together family members and friends, black and white, in a mutually supportive battle against disaster. Eventually Randy, as a lieutenant in the Army Reserve, will have an ironic comment of the past: even in the meantime, through the year that follows. The day, all the human strengths and failures come into play, with the help of ordinary people hanging in the balance. Pat Frank's classic post-apocalyptic novel remains "an extraordinarily real picture of human beings mortally wounded by catastrophe, but still driven by the uncomprehending determination of trying somehow to keep on being alive." —The New Yorker
