Biochemical Preparations Volume 11:

Dehydrogenases Jonathan, 2013-11-21 This book brings together important work on the structure and function of the dehydrogenases requiring nicotinamide coenzymes. The structure and function of lactate dehydrogenase, alcohol dehydrogenase and glyceraldehyde 3 phosphate dehydrogenase are compared. These are the relatively simple oligomeric dehydrogenases for which very extensive structural and mechanistic information is available. Kinetic studies are dealt with in general terms with selected examples. Genetic and structural relationships revealed by primary structure are discussed. General features of the specificity of dehydrogenase reactions are described. The pyridine nucleotide disulphide oxidoreductases exemplify a type of multicomponent enzyme complex. Lipoamide dehydrogenase, glutathione reductase and thioredoxin reductase are described and compared. The fatty acid synthesizing systems of some organisms are nonaggregated whereas in other organisms they are multienzyme complexes containing in animal tissues for example two closely related multifunctional polypeptide chains. The dehydrogenase activities of the fatty acid synthesizing systems afford many points of interest which are described and discussed. Hydroxymethylglutaryl CoA reductase occupies a key position in the synthesis of isoprenoid compounds including cholesterol. It probably occurs in all forms of life in animal cells; it is a microsomal enzyme. Its properties are reviewed.
