ABSTRACT The objective of diagnosis prediction involves foreseeing the potential diseases/conditions according to analyzing patients' historical Electronic Health Records (EHRs). The primary challenge in this task is to develop a predictive model that is both sturdy and accurate, while also being interpretable. The most advanced models usually take recurrent neural networks (RNNs) as backbones and then utilize other techniques, such as attention mechanisms, to address this challenge. However, the effectiveness of these models heavily relies on having ample EHR data. Consequently, when the data is insufficient, the performance of these models declines significantly. Recently, graph-based attention models have been proposed to mitigate the issues caused by insufficient data, although they do not fully capitalize on the knowledge present in medical ontologies. To address these problems, knowledge-based recurrent neural networks (named KARNS) are introduced, which is an end-to-end, robust, and accurate deep learning-based architecture designed to predict patients' future health information. KARNS explicitly leverages the high-level representations of medical codes within the medical ontologies to enhance the accuracy of predictions. Experimental outcomes demonstrate that the proposed KARNS outperforms existing approaches on three real-world medical datasets. It ensures robustness even with limited training data and learns disease representations that are interpretable.

I. INTRODUCTION

The prediction of patients' future health status using their historical Electronic Healthcare Records (EHRs) has garnered significant attention from healthcare providers and researchers alike [1]–[9]. Specifically, the field of diagnosis prediction, which focuses on forecasting future diagnoses based on patients' sequential EHR data, has become a popular yet challenging area of research. The challenges within diagnosis prediction encompass two main aspects: 1) effectively modeling sequential EHR data to capture their unique characteristics, such as high-dimensionality and noise existence, and 2) ensuring reliable predictive performance even in the presence of limited training data.

Various deep learning approaches have been proposed to achieve this objective [10]–[14]. One such approach, Med2Vec [14], simulates word embedding techniques [15] to learn embeddings for medical codes in a low-dimensional space, which are used to predict future visits or potential diseases for patients. However, Med2Vec only models the codes in a short visit window and treats each visit as independent. This approach ignores the importance of modeling the sequential nature of EHR data. To capture sequential dependencies within healthcare records, state-of-the-art diagnosis prediction methods commonly employ recurrent neural networks (RNNs) [11]–[13], [16]–[18]. For instance, the reverse time attention model (RETAIN) [10] utilizes two time-ordered reverse RNNs with attention mechanisms to further boost the prediction performance. Besides, the design of RETAIN makes it output the attention weights of each medical code during the prediction, which increases the interpretability of the diagnosis prediction task. Another RNN-based approach, Dipole, [13] uses a bidirectional RNN (BRNN) with different attention mechanisms, leading to improved prediction accuracy. However, these models of-
