ABSTRACT

In psychiatric diagnosis, a contemporary data-driven, manual-based method for mental disorders classification is the most popular technique; however, it has several inevitable flaws. Using the three-way decision as a framework, we propose a unified model that stands for clinicians' subjective approach (CSA) analysis consisting of three parts: quantitative analysis, quantitative analysis, and evaluation-based analysis. A ranking list and a set of numerical weights based on illness magnitude levels according to the clinician's greatest degree of assumptions are the findings of the qualitative and quantitative investigation. We further create a comparative classification of illnesses into three groups with varying important levels; a three-way evaluation-based model is utilized in this study for the aim of understanding and portraying these results in a more clear way. This proposed method might be integrated with the manual-based process as a complementary tool to improve precision while diagnosing mental disorders..

1. Introduction

In this modern era, where technology is at its peak, with endless amusement and entertainment scopes, still, a substantial amount of people, mostly young adults, are suffering from depression and other mental disorders [1]. Prevalence can be seen as having a lack of motivation to live, losing interest in everything among common people. Hence, they are frequently thriving towards psychiatric diagnosis than in the past days. Therefore, improper diagnosis of mental health disorders may lead to even more vulnerable consequences in a greater sense from an individual to a social perspective [38]. The traditional form of psychiatric diagnosis is much pretentious nowadays as few recent studies demonstrate several shortcomings within the widely established systems used for classifying mental disorders, namely, bipolar disorder, anxiety disorders, phobias, substance use disorder, mood disorders, and many others [2,3]. More often these recognized tools, such as DSM-5 [7] and ICD-11 [8], fails to distinguish between the proper and correct disorder diagnosis of a complex phenomenon in individual cases. Patients with the same disorder exhibit diverse symptom profiles during diagnosis [35] and comorbidities or co-occurring conditions creating numerous clinical and research challenges as well
