An epidemiological perspective

RICHARD P. DONAGHY, MD

FRANCIS J. O'NEILL, MD, PhD, MRCGP

It is clearly recognized that patients with NIDDM have an increased risk for CHD. Recent data indicate that persons with glucose concentrations in the nondiabetic range may be at higher risk for CHD. These associations may not represent cause and effect, however. Emerging data suggest that hyperglycemia and CHD may both arise from hyperinsulinemia/insulin resistance. In support of this hypothesis are studies showing that NIDDM and CHD have many risk factors in common, including age, elevated blood pressure, dyslipidemia, adiposity, and a central pattern of fat distribution. Moreover, these risk factors are unique concomitants of hyperinsulinemia, itself a risk factor for CHD and perhaps for NIDDM. Although the duration of NIDDM has been infrequently related to risk of CHD, the authors hypothesize that duration of hyperinsulinemia/insulin resistance would be a more sensitive marker for risk of CHD. The relation of IDDM to CHD is a different situation. The etiological process leading to IDDM, namely the destruction of  $\beta$ -cells in genetically predisposed persons, is not related to cardiovascular risk. However, IDDM patients still have an excess of CVD, the risk factor for which may vary according to the location of the disease (e.g., LEAD vs. CHD). There is a strong relationship between proteinuria and CVD, which has led to a general theory of vascular complications in IDDM based on defective hepatic sulfate metabolism (Homo hyposulfemia). Recent evidence challenges parts of this hypothesis, and the possibility is raised that a higher case-fatality rate in a subgroup of patients with both renal and CVD explains part of the renal connection, as does the general worsening of CVD risk factors.

Despite advances in the primary prevention of CHD and declining CHD mortality rates, death from CHD and stroke remain among the leading causes of death in the United States (1). Since 1987, diabetes mellitus has been listed as the seventh leading cause of death in the U.S., and also is associated with morbidity and mortality caused by CVD. In fact, diabetic persons suffer 2 to 4 times the risk of developing and dying from CVD than nondiabetic persons (2). Although this relation has been known for some time, the reasons for it remain incompletely understood. Recent evidence indicates that even nondiabetic persons with moderately elevated glucose levels may be more likely to develop CHD than those without such elevations (3). One of the most interesting questions remaining is: glucose intolerance/CHD: is it whether it is causative or whether it may be related to a third, as yet unknown, factor.

Here we review major epidemiological findings concerning the associations between hyperglycemia, NIDDM, insulin resistance, and CVD. It is our hypothesis that, although elevated glucose concentrations and its sequelae may be directly atherogenic, some important evidence suggests that peripheral resistance to insulin-mediated glucose homeostasis may be the predominant third factor predisposing susceptible persons to atherosclerosis and its clinical manifestations, including diabetes. Although a few studies have investigated a link between diabetes and stroke, this association will not be covered in this article.

DEFINITION— A review of the literature relating glucose intolerance to CHD is complicated by varying definitions of terms. Only recently have criteria been established by which epidemiological studies may define NIDDM and IGT (4). In the past, investigators have used a variety of different definitions to classify a diabetic person, including oral hypoglycemic use of insulin or oral hypoglycemic

Health Psychology Annabel Broome, 2013-11-11 ANNABEL K BROOME The importance of psychological processes in the experience of health and sickness is being increasingly recognized There is mounting evidence for the role of personal behaviour in current trends of morbidity and mortality which is reflected in rapid and significant developments in psychological research. Patterns of illness and death have changed in recent years with concurrent changes in demands on health services, the skills of carers and the adjustments of the sick person. It is within this changing scene that clinical and health psychologists are becoming increasingly involved in applied research into the prevention or alleviation of current health problems. These changes are also influencing the training of health professionals with behavioural sciences now forming a substantial component of basic curricula in medical schools and other areas of professional training. This book has arisen from this changing clinical scene and the need to convey useful psychological principles to care givers. Part One concentrates on the general psychological processes that have relevance in many health settings in the prevention, alleviation and management of illness as well as current practices in health care delivery. As these developments have been patchy, Part Two focuses on selected specialties that have received attention. This book is not a comprehensive review of work done in all medical specialties although the structure has been chosen to reflect the prevalent sub divisions of medical teamwork. Epidemiology Bulletin, 1992

Treatment of the Obese Patient Robert F. Kushner, Daniel H. Bessesen, 2007-05-08. The aim of this book is to inform clinicians of recent advances in obesity research and provide a review of current treatment issues and strategies. Part 1 covers new discoveries in the physiological control of body weight as well as the pathophysiology of obesity. Part 2 covers a range of issues that are central to the clinical management of obese patients. This illustrated volume will stimulate and engage clinicians. Textbook of Diabetic Neuropathy Henning Andersen, 2002-12-18. Awareness of neuropathy as a chronic complication of diabetes is constantly increasing. Diabetes centers adopt methods to diagnose neuropathy without neurological training. This trend calls for instructions on how to use and interpret diagnostic methods. This book includes recent research and covers clinical, technical and public health aspects of neuropathy, bringing together the top experts in the field. The Medical Journal of Malaysia, 1990. Principles and Practice of Endocrinology and Metabolism Kenneth L. Becker, 2001. Established as the foremost text in the field, Principles and Practice of Endocrinology and Metabolism is now in its thoroughly revised, updated Third Edition. This practical, clinically relevant and comprehensive text covers the entire field of endocrinology and metabolism, including the diffuse endocrine system, morphology and physiology, diagnosis and treatment of endocrine diseases, endocrinology of the female hormones and cancer, and much more. The Third Edition contains new chapters reflecting the latest advances and features expanded coverage of genetics and the endocrinology of sepsis. More than 1,400 illustrations complement the text. A drug formulary appears at the back of the book. Cumulated Index Medicus, 2000. Acta Paediatrica, 1998. Transactions of the Royal Society of Tropical Medicine and Hygiene Royal Society of Tropical Medicine and Hygiene, 1991. Technical Report Series, 1994. Saudi Medical Journal, 1990. Disease in Populations in Transition Alan C. Swedlund, George J. Armelagos, 1990-10-24. Societies in transition are often faced with new settings and/or new diseases that require a response in order for the affected group to thrive or survive. A lack of effective response by a transitional population to a new pathogen can lead to the group's disintegration. A stark example of this historically is the decline of Native American civilizations with the arrival of European colonists in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. The transitional response mechanism has been a neglected topic in anthropology until the publication of this book. In a broad selection of nineteen essays by distinguished researchers, the epidemiology and health status of prehistoric, historical, and present-day populations in transition are thoroughly explored. Different models—biomedical, ethnomedical, ecological, and politicoeconomic—are used to illustrate the effects of transition on the health of human populations throughout the world. Swedlund and Armelagos have compiled and arranged these essays into three parts: genetic and evolutionary perspectives; infectious disease and nutrition in temporal perspective; and social epidemiology. Some of the topics studied in the essays include disease and evolution in Amerindian populations; health and disease in prehistoric transitional peoples; mortality and morbidity consequences of nutritional variation in early child growth and social support; and mortality in post-transition populations. This insightful book will provide a vital perspective for medical anthropologists, development specialists, epidemiologists, and health professionals, as well as for graduate students in related course areas.
