Financial System Genevieve Boyreau-Debray, Shang-Jin Wei, 2004 State owned financial institutions have been proposed as a way to address market failure but the recent literature has also highlighted their pathological problems This paper studies the case of China for pitfalls of a state dominated financial system including possible segmentation of the internal capital market due to local government interference and mis allocation of capital Even without formal legal prohibition to capital movement across regions we find that capital mobility within China is low Furthermore to the extent some capital moves around the country the government as opposed to the private sector tends to allocate capital systematically away from more productive regions toward less productive ones In this context a smaller role of the government in the financial sector might increase economic efficiency and the rate of economic growth National Bureau of Economic Research web site
