Space Science for the 21st Century National Aeronautics and Space Administration (NASA), 2018-07-11 Throughout its history the U S Space Science technologies program has been enormously productive Its accomplishments have rewritten the textbooks But now the economic environment has changed dramatically The Nation s scientific and technological goals are being reexamined and redefined And the social contract between the scientific community and the Federal Government is being rewritten There is an expectation that the American public should receive more direct benefits from its investment in science and technology This Strategic Plan reflects this new paradigm It presents a carefully selected set of new scientific initiatives that build on past accomplishments to continue NASA s excellence in Space Science At the same time it responds to fiscal constraints by defining a new approach to planning developing and operating Space Science missions In particular investments in new technologies will permit major scientific advances to be made with smaller more focused and less costly missions With the introduction of advanced technologies smaller does not have to mean less capable The focus on new technologies also provides and opportunity for the Space Science program to enhance its direct contribution to the country s economic base At the same time the program can build on public interest to strengthen its contributions to education and scientific literacy With this plan we are taking the first steps toward shaping the Space Science program of the 21st century In doing so we face major challenges It will be a very different program than might have been envisioned even a few years ago But it will be a program that remains at the forefront of science technology and education We intend to continue rewriting the textbooks
