18th and 19th Century Linguistic and Literary Criticism as a Source of Multilingual Research

A Corpus Based Approach

Abstract: The article deals with forms of hidden multilingualism in language and literary criticism of the 18th and 19th centuries. After terminological clarifications and a brief discussion of heuristic methods, different varieties of multilingualism are examined using selected examples, mainly from German discourse, but also from contemporary English discourse. A special focus is given to Goethe as a multilingual and multilingualism-friendly author. The paper concludes with the introduction of a corpus-based approach to multilingualism in 18th and 19th century linguistic and literary criticism, presenting the project of a relational database for systematic research on multilingualism in that period.

Keywords: Language Criticism, Literary Criticism, Hidden Multilingualism, Interlinguality, Goethe, Romanticism

1 Preliminary

The title of this contribution takes two subjects for granted: a) language and literary criticism and b) multilingualism. However, both must briefly be problematized before an attempt can be made to illuminate the former as a source for research into the latter. In determining the time period (18th and 19th centuries), we make a restriction for reasons of manageability. We do not treat two full centuries here, but only one: the period between approximately 1760 and 1840, for which we can draw on a balanced, sufficiently large digital corpus (see below, section 2). Our period under review is therefore the onset of modernity: almost exactly the decades that, in historiography, are often referred to as “die Sattelzeit”, to use a term coined by Reinhart Koselleck.
